Neighbors,

I can't remember what I've passed on at this point, so here's a summary update:

* Yesterday, Thursday, Aug 3, a quorum was restored to the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission. The Senate voted to confirm two nominees to FERC, paving the way for the commission to have its first quorum in six months. With the return of a quorum, the Certificate of Convenience and Necessity for the Nexus pipeline can be issued.

* CoRN's Court Case: The court has not yet ruled on injunction relief that would prevent the Certificate from being issued at least until the case has been resolved. (Federal Judge Adams has referred the injunction motion to Magistrate Burke who has had two phone conferences with the lawyers to gather information).

* On July 3, a Medina district court judge ruled that Nexus must halt surveying activities until they have received the final Certificate of Convenience and Necessity. Surveying before the final certificate is premature and goes against state law.

* We are not alone, on July 28, A group of Virginia landowners asked a district court to block the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission from allowing the Mountain Valley pipeline to use eminent domain for the 300-mile line to cross from northern West Virginia to southern Virginia. A Law professor stated, ""What's unusual is that you have these two challenges to a door that everybody thought was closed "

So as for CORN's lawsuit...we are on hold... who will issue something first... the court w/ injunction relief or FERC quorum w/ a Nexus Certificate ???

We are in a David Vs Goliath Fight against a $350 million dollar a year federal agency and the largest oil and gas company in North America. CoRN has legal fees from three lawyers. A blast zone expert-witness alone will cost $20,000.
